The present invention pertains to a system for sanitizing a beverage container, and more particularly to a system for sanitizing a beverage container that requires no change to the container, works with a wide variety of beverage containers, works with multiple containers simultaneously, and extends shelf life of the contents stored in the container. Traditionally, beverage containers that allow for some degree of temperature manipulation of the contents prior to consumption are limited in terms of available space. Specifically, the addition of a cooling device such as a freezer, refrigerator or ice pack necessary to obtain the desired cooling effect results in a more bulky unit. To obtain the desired cooling effect, such a cooling device is typically provided to cool the container to a temperature below room temperature (e.g., -18 degrees Fahrenheit) and may remain in the container for a time period substantially longer than the time period that the container is actually stored by the consumer. To avoid the creation of ice in the cooling device, it is conventional to provide a perforation or rupture in the container prior to the cooling operation. When the container is subsequently opened by the consumer, the cooling device or ice may be removed by the consumer. U.S. Pat. No. 5,771,635 to Sampson and U.S. Pat. No. 5,899,242 to Sampson et al. describe insulated beverage containers that include a plurality of interconnecting chambers. The chambers may be interconnected by coolant passages so that a cooling effect may be achieved without the need for ice or other cooling medium. The coolant passage is typically provided by weakening the container walls by perforation to form an opening or by using a rupture in the container bottom to form an opening. While the above systems function for their intended purposes, the functions available are limited to traditional beverage containers, are
